Has Them Guessing.

"For women only." That's the order of the day to-morrow during Pearl Tangley's Egyptian mind-reading act, when the wonderful student of occultism will answer personal and private questions put by the women who are anxious to know various things about their past, present and future.

Two performances will be given to-morrow afternoon, and the men may enjoy the pictures and vaudeville portions of the programs, but when Miss Tangley appears to have her private conference with the women only, the men will be asked to retire.

There will not be a man in the theatre, from front to back. The manager, the doorkeepers, ushers and stage hands will retire to the street and remain there until Miss Tangley makes her exit.

The treasurer will move his ticket office out into the lobby and will sell from a table. There will not be the slightest occasion for the women to fear the presence of a single man, and they may feel free to ask any questions that they desire to have answered.

Miss Tangley has developed a wonderful thaumaturgical insight, demonstrating that her tutelage at the hands of the priests of Egypt was carefully and ably managed.
